The Captain Kidd Racket

Frank Crane was a happy man as he arose from the dinner table. He walked over to his wife and planted a tender kiss on her cheek.

"I'm a lucky man to have a companion like you for the past twenty years. You just know my every wish and anticipate everything I want. That was the best steak I ate in a long time. And the apple pie was perfect. One more job and then we can call it quits. We'll have enough to buy that farm and retire."

"I do hope it is the last job," replied Anna Crane. "I don't want to spend the rest of the years left to us behind prison bars. And you know they send you to different prisons. How vulgar it is! No appreciation of what it means to be separated from your beloved."

The door bell rang twice, and Frank Crane walked slowly to the door. He opened the peep hole and then smiled as his right hand turned the door knob.

"Welcome, George! We just had a steak supper. Anna has some left. We didn't expect you until morning. Shall she put it on the fire for you? We have one of those small charcoal broilers."

George Landau pointed to his rather large waist line and then refused the offer.

"I got our sucker lined up. He ought to be good for at least thirty-thousand on this deal. I bought a section of the beach property just below Howton's Point. You leave for the place tomorrow. This fellow, Henry W. Stahl, is just nuts about anything relating to Captain Kidd. I got the fake treasure chests all lined up. And the fake pearls, diamonds, and brass bars should look like the real stuff. Mac made the maps for me from some old parchment. I met this fellow, Stahl, at a meeting of the Historical Society. He invited me over to his house next week and wants to see the maps. I'll use the option gag on him, and will he bite!"

Henry W. Stahl was excited as his eyes pored over the old map spread open on the table.

"Everybody knows that Captain Kidd buried his treasure somewhere on Long Island Sound. There have been a lot of fake maps, but you can see this parchment is very old. Have you checked the location?"

"I have," replied George Landau. "And I did something else. I sent away to Washington for all maps of the area available. In addition, I contacted the firm of Peterson & Meyers, the map dealers. I have those maps in my brief case. Definitely, there was once a small inlet right at the point marked on the old map. Captain Kidd sailed up to a distance of about a mile. Then he came ashore in a rowboat. According to the old legend, he buried his treasure on the side of a small hill. Then he shot the men with him. Their skeletons should be protecting the treasure."

"Let us go and dig for the treasure tomorrow," suggested Henry W. Stahl. "I have tried many places on the island during the past ten years, but, alas, no luck. This looks like the real thing."

"Just one obstacle," pointed out George Landau. "The property is owned by a middle-aged couple. Mr. and Mrs. Frank Crane live there. Suppose we visit them and get an option on their property. We can ask permission to dig. We'll tell them we are hotel people and are thinking of putting up a motel, swimming pool and complete beach resort."

Frank and Anna Crane played their parts to perfection. Frank looked at the option papers and hesitated before signing.

"It isn't a question of money. I ask you forty-thousand dollars for this property. You tell me it is worth about five-thousand dollars. But if you are going to erect all those buildings, it should be worth that amount to you. I am not in the position of having to sell. I have an independent income."

"But I do want to get away to a drier climate," interrupted Anna. "You know what Dr. Crandall said. And anyway these gentlemen are not as yet buying the property. All they are doing is giving us one-hundred dollars for an option. So, sign the paper, dear."

The two men walked outside five minutes later with the option, and Anna gave her husband a big kiss.

"George certainly has that sucker excited. In a few hours they will find the treasure."

George Landau and Henry W. Stahl got into a jeep. They drove north along the beach and then cut off at an old tree. Next to it was a large boulder. Then the two men got out of the car, and George Landau consulted the map.

"We walk sixty paces due east from the center of that rock. Let's do it."

The two men were soon facing a small hill. George Landau took a shovel and began to dig away sand. After an hour's digging, he hit some wood.

"Help me move the wood away. It looks like an old door leading into some kind of a tunnel."

Another hour's work, and the two men entered a small tunnel. George Landau flashed a search light.

"Look at the skulls," shouted Henry W. Stahl in glee. "And those two old chests. Hurry, open one of them."

The chest was soon opened, and there were bars of "gold" in it. The second chest showed the fake pearls and diamonds.

"We could take it all away," remarked George W. Landau, "but I guess it would be dishonest. And we would be caught. I know you are an honorable man and will do the right thing. Suppose we cover up our tracks and return home. In the morning we can get the property by purchasing it."

Frank Crane had insisted on cash, and now he and his wife carefully counted the bills on a table.

"The property is all yours, Mr. Stahl. And we hope you are very successful in your venture," said Frank Crane. "Now you have the deed. Tomorrow morning you can take possession of the property. We are rather tired and excited people. I am going to go west with my wife."

For half a day, Henry W. Stahl had waited for George Landau to show up. Then, worried, he went to the spot himself and started digging. A terrible thought seized him. Suppose George Landau had come to this place earlier and removed the treasure! Frantically he dug and couldn't find the door!

By nightfall he had hired fifty men to dig, and they couldn't find a thing. He explained to Captain John Matthews of the county police force.

"I realize what a sucker I was! When I went home to look at the maps, they were burned to ashes. Must have been treated chemically. Even if we caught those swindlers, how could I prove my story? And, in addition, I was something of a pig and cheat myself. Maybe in the long run I got what I deserved."

There was a big smile on Captain John Matthews' face. An idea had just been born.

"If you want to invest about five-thousand dollars, I think we can catch the swindlers. We'll have to get the local papers to cooperate, and the story we'll give them will go over the big news syndicates. We'll have pictures taken."

It was a pleasant day, and Frank and Anna were seated comfortably reading the Sunday newspapers. Suddenly George rushed up to them with a copy of an out-of-town newspaper.

"They really found Captain Kidd's treasure on that property. Here are pictures of the treasure chest and the remains of an old row-boat. Estimates say the treasure is worth about two-million dollars. However, they also say the former owners are entitled to at least half of it. Some obscure legal point. The property was sold only for hotel purposes and not to dig treasures. So back we go for our share."

When they arrived in Long Island, the three were quickly arrested. Then it dawned upon Frank Crane that they had fallen for a gag. But George Landau made an offer of restitution.

"We'll give you back all the money and even throw in the land. I think we are only a thousand short in cash and can raise that. But please don't prosecute us."

The money, short of one thousand dollars, was then returned to Henry W. Stahl. He kept the deed to the land also. The prisoners were released by the county officials, only to be turned over to the federal authorities who were interested in them for other illegal activities.

Before they left for the West, with handcuffs and proper guards, Henry W. Stahl paid them a visit.

"I want you to know I just sold the land to a real motel outfit. They gave me forty-thousand dollars. Had you folks been honest, you would have had that money. But I did have a bit of larceny in my soul. So the entire profit goes to a foundation to give kids an outing every year dressed up in Captain Kidd's imitation pirate clothing. And it will be a racket — although not your kind."
